Charles Dickens: Voice of the poor

Britain is a nation of brilliant writers, but one of the most popular English novelists in history is called Charles Dickens (1812 – 1870).

At a time when Britain was the major economic and political power in the world, Charles Dickens was the voice of the poor. He wrote classics like Oliver Twist or David Copperfield, which describe the sad lives of poor working class people in Britain's early Industrial Age. Dickens didn't invent his descriptions of the dirt, poverty and child labour. He saw it all as he was growing up and it made him want to fight against social injustice<sup>1</sup> and for social reforms.

Dickens was born near Portsmouth on 7th February 1812, as the second of eight children. His father was an office clerk who was paid quite well but always spent more than he earned.

Charles, a small sickly child, started school at the age of nine and soon discovered his love of reading. But then, at the age of eleven, this happy period in his life came to a sudden end because his family was no longer able to pay for his school education. But things got even worse: a few months later, his father was locked up in Marshalsea prison in London with most of the family because he couldn't pay his debts<sup>2</sup>.

To support his family, Charles was sent to work in Warren's Blacking Factory, a dirty, rat-infested<sup>3</sup> shoe polish factory in London, where he had to stick labels on bottles six days a week from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. for only one shilling<sup>4</sup> a day. Each evening, Charles returned alone to his cheap rented room in Camden Town, a three-mile walk from the factory. Sunday was the only day he could visit his family at Marshalsea prison. A great deal of this extremely unhappy time of Dickens' life is retold in his later writing, for example in David Copperfield, his most autobiographical novel.

Luckily, after about a year, his father received an unexpected sum of money and Charles could go back to school where he threw himself into the study of literature. He also wrote for the school newspaper and for a local newspaper. This experience convinced him that he could earn his daily bread with his talent and could guarantee a regular income which he could live on. At 15 he left school and got a job as an office boy. But the work bored him. So he gave it up a few months later and went into journalism, where he was soon a very successful reporter.

At the age of 24 Dickens started publishing his first novel, a satirical serial called The Pickwick Papers, which was published in monthly parts for nearly two years and became an immediate success. Thanks to this triumph, Dickens finally became a full-time novelist giving the world around 20 wonderful novels, all of them bestsellers.

Today, Dickens' novels are taught in schools around the world as examples of brilliant writing. On 7th February 2012, Dickens' 200th birthday was remembered throughout Britain. One of the main aims of the celebration was to encourage young people to read. With their child protagonists such as Oliver Twist or David Copperfield, Dickens' works are just right for young readers.

Although living at a different time, far away from the problems Dickens' characters have to face, young readers meet characters who – despite their difference – they can look up to for what they do. Through sharing the stories of Dickens' characters, their thoughts and experiences, young readers are made aware of social injustice and discover the similarities between today's world and Dickens' time.

<sup>4</sup> one shilling – worth about €4 today (At the time you could buy about 3 kilos of bread for one shilling.)

Punk for a month

.... "Here I am," I thought, "Julie Hamilton, straight<sup>1</sup> American grade 11 student. Looks – plain<sup>2</sup>. Parties, going out – forget about it! Boyfriend – only in my fantasies. My life is dead boring. ... I need a change!" ...

5 Robbie and Tanya, two girls from my gym class, came in. They were very punk, but somehow they had always fascinated me. ... PUNK! ... I would become a punk! ... I was going to surprise everyone.

The next day I called my best friend Anne, who went to another school. "What?" she asked amazed. "You heard me. By tomorrow I'll be a punk. I'm sick of being called a goody-goody!" "Okay," she said, "if that's your decision. But I think you are making a great mistake." She made 10 me promise that I'd only be a punk for one month – only until my hair grew out. I agreed. After a month I would stop.

I thought Mom would kill me, but she must have been too tired to argue with me. She just said: "It's your life. If you think it's important, go right ahead. But if it gets you into trouble, don't come crying to me."

15 I went to the hairstylist straight away and got a punk hair-cut. Then I dyed my hair green in front. And I went to a second-hand shop where I spent nearly all my savings on a punk-style outfit.

The next morning I was nervous and a little scared. I had put on punk-style make-up and I wore a purple mini, a black and purple striped shirt, a black leather jacket, high-heeled shoes and large black earrings.

20 I took a deep breath when I stepped into the school building. "It's silly to worry," I told myself. "Nothing has changed, except your appearance." Robbie told me I looked terrific. I got a few other compliments, too, but most people were staring at me.

My first chance to talk to my clique came during lunch period. Patty, Ellen, Kelly, Stacy and Cathy were already sitting at the table we shared every day. No one said a word as I approached.
25 I sat down and looked at them. For five minutes nothing happened. Finally I said: "What's the matter?" Cathy spoke first. "Are you going to look like that for a long time?" "I like it," I said ... "It's not really you, Julie," Ellen said. No one replied. No one looked my way.

"Fine" I said angrily. "I'm not going to bother you any more. I'll just sit with Robbie and Tanya. What a fool I was to think you were really friends!" I stomped off.

30 Robbie and Tanya were glad to see me. I held back my tears and tried to enjoy myself.

The next few days were the best days of my life. People I didn't know stopped me in the streets, to talk to me or compliment me – Robbie's and Tanya's friends of course. But it wasn't only punks. And I got a few friendly looks from boys who had never given me a second look before.

35 Soon nobody was staring at me anymore. Teachers and students had got used to me. My ex-friends, however, seemed to take every opportunity to try to hurt me. One day, they were all standing by their lockers. When I arrived, Kelly suddenly said to them rather loudly: "Hey, guys, I'm having a party this Saturday. Can you all come?" "Terrific! Who are you inviting?" Cathy asked seemingly innocent<sup>3</sup>. "Oh, everyone normal," Kelly informed her as loudly as before. That did it.

40 Anne came over the next afternoon and reminded me of my promise to stop after one month. "I'm no longer sure if I want to", I said.

by Lynn Steiner / grade 11 / Lincoln Park High School, Chicago

<sup>3</sup> seemingly innocent – doing as if she didn't mean to hurt her
